Arakelian is accompanied by Rafael Matevossian, vice-president for international affairs at YSU.

While in Fresno, the university delegation is expected to meet with CSUF President Dr. John Welty to sign a five-year agreement with provisions for exchange of students and faculty in a variety of fields.

The Fresno Bee

If anyone's concerned about budget problems at Fresno State University, compare them with the troubles at Armenia's Yerevan State University.

It's freezing cold, and the heat doesn't work. Pipes break. Buildings crack. You can't count on electricity.

The brand-new republic of Armenia is in a netherworld between war and peace. YSU is temporarily closed.

And the university looks to start over with an entirely different educational structure.

YSU President Norair Arakelian visited Fresno State on Monday, signed a five-year exchange agreement with FSU President John Welty, and described a different world of trouble in higher education.

Annual student exchange

The agreement with Fresno State calls for an annual exchange of five students and an undetermined number of faculty and administrators each year.

Arakelian, a mathematician, wants to restructure his university along the lines of Fresno State and other American universities. But he's beginning from near zero in Western administration and looking to the best minds at Fresno State, the University of California, Georgetown University and the University of Michigan to guide the way.

Associated Press

"Our educational system has been very conservative, very centralized," Arakelian said. "It is very specialized. We want more general schools. There have been no real changes yet. We have material difficulties. And people are slow to change their ways."

Arakelian told university faculty members that he wants to launch a three-tiered system similar to bachelor's, master's and doctorate degrees in American universities. A high priority will be establishing English as a core academic language.

Other academic disciplines must begin from scratch, Arakelian said. Political science and economics, for instance, functioned under political constraints of the Soviet system.

New discipline easier

Speaking of political science, Arakelian said it would be easier to create a new academic discipline than to reform the old one.

Despite the challenges, Arakelian was calm and determined.

"No, it is not desperate," he said. "If it were, we could not think of reforms and the future."

Skirmishes between Armenians and Muslims in neighboring Azerbaijan have killed more than 1,000 people in the last four years. The main dispute involves the Armenian enclave of Nagorno-Karabakh inside Azerbaijan.

Arakelian was asked if it feels like war or peace in Yerevan.

"It is together," he said. "Peace and war. Sometimes you feel it is like wartime. It is unusual. You don't feel it is constant war, but it is not normal."

Economist Rafael Matevossian, vice president for international relations at YSU, accompanied Arakelian. Asked when he first thought the Soviet system couldn't work, Matevossian said, "From the day of its birth."

Yerevan, Fresno State Universities Sign Student Exchange Program

Following the signing of the student exchange program. From left: Dr. Norair Arakelian, president of Yerevan State University, and Dr. John Welty, president of Fresno State University.

On Monday evening, February 10, at the St. Paul Armenian Church Minor Hall, the Tekeyan Cultural Association, the St. Paul Armenian Church Educational Program, and the Fresno State Kalfayan Center for Armenian Studies co-sponsored a lecture entitled "Higher Education in the New Republic of Armenia." The guest speakers were from Yerevan State University.

The first speaker was the University president, Dr. Norair Arakelian, followed by the vice president for international affairs, Raffi Matevossian. On their agenda was the recent signing of a student exchange program between Fresno State and Yerevan State. They were also to speak about the harsh conditions of present-day Armenia.

Dr. Arakelian is a mathematician and a member of the Academy of Sciences of Armenia. He has written many articles and broken much ground in the field of approximation theory.

Rafael Matevossian is an economist and has been vice president since 1981, during which time he has been responsible for students from abroad, studying in Armenia.

The evening began with Prof. Barlow Der Mugrdechian of the Fresno State Kalfayan Center for Armenian Studies greeting and warmly welcoming the many in attendance. He then spoke about the signing of the agreement between Fresno State and Yerevan State at 11 am that morning during a press conference at CSUF. According to the agreement, students from each university will be exchanged for either one month, one semester or one year.

Der Mugrdechian further commented that "the signing was an unprecedented event for the Armenian Studies program, and for the students specifically." He then introduced the first speaker,

Dr. Arakelian, who summed the purpose of the exchange program as being "an encouragement to students to return and to study in their historic homeland" as well as being "an educational link with the Diaspora, and in many ways an inspiration, yet a learning experience." The Fresno State University Armenian Studies Program laid the groundwork for this program to be initiated not only with CSUF, but also with USC, UCLA, Georgetown University, Northeastern University, and the University of Michigan, and for this, Dr. Arakelian was "elated and thankful to have students from such fine universities."

Der Mugrdechian then introduced the vice president of Yerevan State University, Raffi Matevossian, who began his talk by mentioning that Yerevan State University has 18 different schools with social sciences and business being a major focus. He added that the university enrollment is more than 10,000 with over 1,000 faculty and staff. He also mentioned that contrary to the current situation in the country, the "university does not have within its realm any food shortages or other deprivations for students." Matevossian stated that the university's "current budget, when compared with the budget of 25 years ago reveals a shrinkage to a fraction of its original value, "because through the years we've been faced with financial troubles including double-digit inflation as well as a serious devaluation of the ruble."

Finally, Matevossian said the university needs teachers from several fields, including the interdisciplinary fields and the arts. He also thanked the Kalfayan Center for Armenian Studies and Fresno State.

University and California State University, Fresno. Mr. Kalfayan had visited Yerevan in November of 1990 to assist in the development of the ties.

President Welty presented Dr. Arakelian with a plaque inscribed with the CSUF logo and in turn was presented with a specially prepared bottle of "Welty" Armenian cognac, which was beautifully decorated.

The agreement was hailed by Dr. Kouymjian as an important step in the ever growing ties between the Republic of Armenia and the United States. The agreement calls for the exchange of up to five students per year to participate in fields of their choosing at the host institution. A summer study option will also be available to CSUF students. Provisions were made for faculty exchanges and also for research to take place in a cooperative atmosphere.

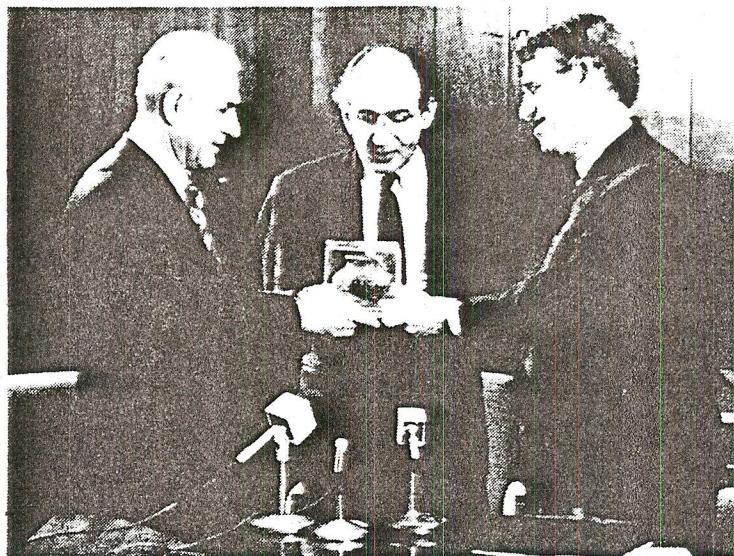

Barlow Der Mugrdechian, who will be coordinating the various programs, remarked that CSUF students now had a very special opportunity before them, through which they could see in person what they had learned about through Armenian Studies classes.

Students will be encouraged by the agreement to return and study in Armenia and enjoy the atmosphere of living among Armenians. The educational ties will provide for a two way exchange and allow students from both countries to experience life in another country.

The Yerevan State University delegation also had the opportunity, through the efforts of the CSUF Armenian Studies Program, to visit Washington, D.C., San Francisco, Los Angeles, Detroit, Boston, and New York. The two-week visit resulted in the signing of three other agreements, with George Mason University, the University of California at Riverside, and Northeastern University in Massachusetts.

The Yerevan State University delegation returned to Yerevan at the end of February to begin to implement the various agreements signed. ■ the historic Gumairi region of Armenia.

The agreement was hailed by Dr. Kouymjian as an important step in the ever-growing ties between the Republic of Armenia and the United States. The agreement calls for the exchange of up to five students per year to participate in fields of their choosing at the host institution. A summer study option will also be available to CSUF students. Provisions were made for faculty exchanges and also for research to take place.

Students will be encouraged by the agreement to return and study in Armenia, said Barlow Der Mugrdechian, who will be coordinating the various programs.

The Yerevan State University delegation also had the opportunity, through the efforts of the CSUF Armenian Studies Program, to visit several cities and universities in the United States.
