validity of prior payments. Just bringing the resolution to the attention of the public may arouse some opposition to its adoption. If someone wishes to contest the past practice of the council, the retroactive application may be questionable. In South San Francisco the councilmen were required to go back to the beginning of the time each had begun to receive lump sum payments and to list his actual expenses. To the extent the lump sum exceeded itemized expenses, the councilmen would have to reimburse the City. On the other hand, if the lump sum payment were less than the actual itemized expenses, he could probably collect the difference.

The other alternatives are for the council to continue with the present practice and assume the risk of having to itemize for actual expenses for the period the lump sum has been paid, or to cease the practice of lump sum payments and begin itemizing for actual expenses.
