Cal State Hayward's Program for Adult Education begins offerings this fall; seventy students expected to start here in '91-'92

"Finding the time to study and manage a full-time job, family and school is challenging," says Valerie Kennedy, who along with over fifty other students will enter the Program for Adult Education (PACE) this fall. An additional fifteen students are expected in the spring.

PACE is designed to make it easier for adults who work full time to finish college. Courses needed to complete a bachelor's degree will be offered evenings and on Saturdays. Some courses will be offered in a format that combines regular classroom meetings with the use of audio and video tapes. Faculty teaching in the program meet to plan curriculum so that information in one class reinforces the content offered in another course. Gale Auletta of the Department of Speech Communication is the faculty coordinator.

Cal State Hayward is offering the program in response to requests from Chabot, Las Positas and Vista Community Colleges. "There is a big demand out there," according to Mary

Any member of the University community may nominate an individual. All nominations must be accompanied by a one-page, signed statement detailing the nominee's qualifications.

Nominations should be sent to University Relations and Development by September 6.

Trapp, associate dean of the School of Arts, Letters and Social Sciences and director of PACE. "PACE is an opportunity for those who have no other way of finishing college to obtain their degree."

Currently the program is geared towards individuals who have been enrolled in PACE at community colleges, but if space is available in classes, students who have A.A. degrees will also be allowed to enroll. Trapp has already conducted two information sessions with employees of Alameda County to explain the program.

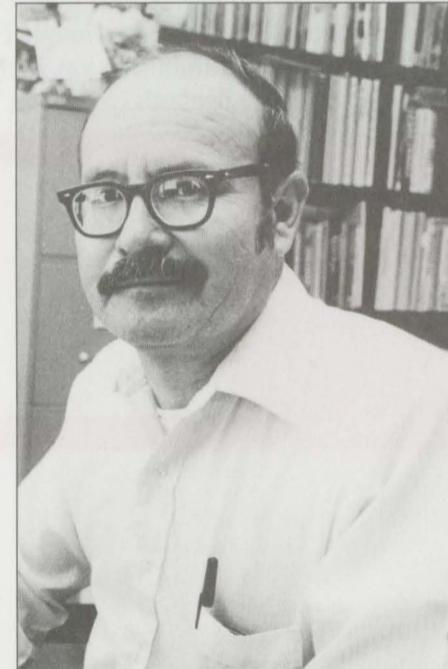

For the coming year, PACE will offer courses leading to a B.A. degree in liberal studies or human development. Options within liberal studies are business, mass communication and human development. The liberal studies credential track may be incorporated into the program in the future.

For more information on PACE, contact the School of Arts, Letters and Social Sciences, 881-3161.—Dee Owens

Bringing it all together—In his position as conference housing coordinator for Pioneer Heights, John Jandoc is combining his CSUH business degree with his student experiences as a club member and as assistant manager at Carlos Bee Hall.

Pioneer Heights serves as conference center during summer months

When Pioneer Heights opened in December 1987, it brought a boost to student life on campus, but the facility also created the opportunity for the campus to become a center for conferences and other residential programs during the summer.

This summer Pioneer Heights has had a steady stream of visitors from Kaiser managers to the youthful participants in the Oakland A's baseball camp. The latter groups were the most evident on campus with their yellow and green uniforms. Nearly 350 youngsters from the ages of nine to fifteen filled three sessions between July 16 and August 2.

For the most part, the facility has been popular with educators. The first group to use it this summer was part of a Stanford sponsored program for teachers of accelerated classes. August 10-24, Teach for America will bring forty teachers here from throughout California. These teachers will be preparing to take jobs in the Oakland schools this fall. Partially overlapping with this group in the use of the center will be fifty managers from Kaiser working with the University's Business Institute for two split five-day sessions. Also staying at the center will be teachers from Japan who teach English in that country.

Pioneer Heights can accommodate 300 conferees per day. Groups using the facility must be meeting for educationally related purposes such as a seminar or a program coordinated through a department on campus.

According to John Jandoc, a 1987 CSUH graduate and coordinator of the summer housing conference schedule, the complex is not filled to capacity but the program is growing each year as word spreads about its availability. Plans are underway to more fully inform both campus members and professional groups and businesses in the area about the range of Cal State Hayward's services for summer conferences.

In addition to housing, Jandoc works with the University Union and the Office of Facility Reservations to provide the conference participants with meeting space and meal plans. He noted that the Union and other campus facilities are available throughout the year for seminars and meetings, while Pioneer Heights is only for summer conference use.
