[June 1921]

Dear Miss Morgan,

I think the lower bed rooms should be like the enclosed plan.

Suppose we take two columns and divide off the room where the bread comes — not ignoring the break but emphasizing it as if we wanted it that way. Then the room is divided naturally into a bed alcove and a sort of living ~~of~~ main

part.
The bed should be small — single or three quarter — with low posts as unobtrusive as possible. Opposite the bed will be the bureau or a side table — something useful.
The two columns can be the grey stone columns we thought of putting in the loggia. These would be good if you want to keep the room severe. They are about the same color as the fireplace.

If however you want to liven the room marble columns or gilt wood can be used.

These columns help cut off the bed alcove from the living part of the room but in no way obscure the fireplace.

We have the door and window as they are on the south side of the living part and we leave the door on the north side of the bed alcove into the
closets and store room.
On the north side of the living part is a long free wall for a tapestry.
The lighting would be different than we planned. There would be a center light in the living part on the ceiling brackets on the east end, lights on the mantel and brackets on standards at bed and bureau WORK
