

Eldorado

COUNTRY CLUB

ELDORADO

Gentleman Gene Sarazen likened it to the Palace at Versailles.

Other notables have called it "The Taj Mahal of the Desert."

Eldorado.

It is the home of a blue book of industry giants, entertainment personalities and national leaders, including former president Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

It is a country club of international reputation, established and enlarged since the Ryder Cup matches in 1959. Its clubhouse is unequalled in elegance. Glittering fountains and mirroring reflection pools terrace the portico entry. The long, low clubhouse shelters a richness and luxury of appointment that belies the unhurried, informal cordiality that is the way of life at Eldorado.

It is a golf course of excellent championship challenge. Visitors who play the meticulously manicured course go away talking to themselves. They talk either about the difficulty they have avoiding trouble from the 2,500 trees and seven lakes or babble on about the incredible beauty of the lush layout set against the background of the Santa Rosa Mountains.
